It is proper to add that we wrote the brief notice above in the confident expectation that we should receive by the carr last evening e voluminous report of the proceedings of the Convention at the hands of our Frankfort correspondent. As, contrary to this expectation, and very seriously to our regret, tendiac be revive controverses which it is its object to a little of the address, and its expectation, and very seriously to our regret, tendiac be revive controverses which it is its object to a little one, by its frequent and a few will simply state, that the one, by its frequent and a few little one, as inconsistent with the little of this address, and the few little of this address. seedings of course cocupy much loss space in our columns than we anticipated. We are indebted for the imperfect though not inaccurate raport we give to the Frankfort Commonwealth of yesterday morning.

Ho risoth from the sea: the jeweled weves

With hasty feet gittle from his path before;
And saldst low normans from the coral caves,
His shapeless samenest foot out to the shore
Lifting his wines from out the irfolded grees,
He files beneath the starlight and the dew,
Over the mountains and the plains of space,
Where lies the Unitance in her draperies blue

With level front and coiderss in his eyes. With level frost and colders in his eyes,
He sweeps ecross the hills where Nature stands,
And in mute scornleg of her wild surprise,
He casts the hlossoms from her el sulege hands.
From off her forehead sed her bosom bare,
He cars the jewels in blareckless mirth—
And all the gens that shine amidst her hair,
His scatters rudoly e'er the eager earth.

Then turning from her, he comes shouting down Upon the trees, who stand erect with pride—Tears off the branches of the Maple brown. And lays the proof Oak on the green hills-ide. The Ash, with hare, white army raised to the sky In still imploring, he ecorne all the more-Bends dowe the Cedars with exultant cry, Act bows to dust the grand old S, comore Then growing gentler as the night wears on,

The linger is longer by som cottage low—
Where ites a maiden, hissling as the dawn,
With dreams upon her eyes, infolding slow.
Ie weaves within her sleep the rarest things—
The brightest gromies she ever knew—
Sull the fitterieg of his restless wings,
Frights her from slumber and her pillow too.

Then sathering sp unto his mighty breast.
The crimson leaves be seathered far and wide.
He bears them to a quiet place of rest,
Just where the Euromer in her sorrow died.
And with a calmer air end slower pace,
Porth from the ferest o'er the plain he flits,
To where prond Automn, with a matchless grace,
Upon her purple throne in upleudor sits. Her flowing drapery of golden bne. Veined with a thread of saralet, deep and hright, is gathered o'er her bosom, damp with dew. And heavy with the darkeess and the night. And drooping Asters with their sleepy eyes,
But ever as a coronal she weaves,

They fade and wither, and their beanty dies, And with his haughty head low at her feet, The Night Wind greets her with a grace most rare Woolng her gently with a musle sweet— His wiegs half folded, stirring the soft air. Drawing her tendarily within his arms. He steels the love-light from her shadowed eyes— And growing loider at her laint alarma I'e soothes with kisses all her feers ned sighs.

But soon the watchful stars grow dlm aed pale

Befo e her | ath the Night Wind steals away, With reverent looks and ctiliness in his tread-Twining his mentle o'er his half bowed hrad. Who stands at prayers beside his Mother's keee, And in proud elience cloks late the eee!
